Spiritual, moral, social and cultural development through RE	SMSC Development Every school must show how well they are promoting SMSC development. RE, as one school subject, should contribute to SMSC development alongside other subjects. Some argue that RE has a unique place in promoting SMSC development, although others dispute this.	It is important to set this within a whole school context to ensure that SMSC development is not just seen as something promoted through RE, but through all curriculum subjects. A general introduction to SMSC can be found here: http://www.doingsmsc.org.uk/ Beginner teachers should review individual school policy and practices for SMSC when in different school placements. They might reflect on an RE lesson they have seen or taught and in what ways it promotes SMSC development, and/or they might plan a lesson paying particular attention to one aspect of SMSC development and reflect on its contribution to the school's policy.	Reading: Pett, S. Visits and Visitors	Fieldwork Visiting a place of worship in the local area can be of huge benefit to beginner teachers. It can enhance their subject knowledge as well as give them opportunities to interact with members of different religions and worldviews. Where visits are not practicable beginner teachers benefit from meeting members of different religions and worldview associations to hear their views and ask questions. Local SACREs often have a list of places of	Visits are usually made to places of worship which are relatively close by. Choosing any place of worship to visit should include engaging with the diversity of practice within different religions through different groups and practices. It is valuable to visit a range of different religious places from different religious traditions, but this is not always possible. Diversity can also be considered by looking at a range of different groups or denominations within a religion, e.g. a range of different Christian churches, chapels and meeting places, so that stereotypes are avoided. If beginner teachers are visiting a place of worship it is important that they engage with the process of organising a visit, as well as the interactions on the day. It helpful for them to have time to consider how they would use the place of worship with a particular class and/or with a particular religious concept in mind. Ensuring there is time for beginner teachers to ask questions of the host should be factored in to any visit. Beginner teachers need to consider imaginative ways of engaging children during visits. DVV: Visiting a Place of Worship is a resource which could encourage beginner teachers in thinking of different ways to engage pupils.	Reading: If fieldwork is not possible then beginner teachers could be encouraged to listen to podcasts or watch online films such as ones found on the Theos site: https://www.theosthinktank.co.uk/comment/podcasts-recordings General advice is given in Pett, S. Students could be asked to evaluate one or more of them and consider planning their own visit/visitor experience. A series of videos for KS1 called 'Charlie and Blue' are available from True Tube. They include resources, notes and lesson plans. In them Charlie and her puppet friend Blue meet people from different faiths and ask questions. RE and Inclusive Practices Religions, Worldviews and their place in Inclusive Education	Religions and Worldviews Why are these important to inclusive education? Recognising the place of the teacher when thinking about inclusion. How religion, worldviews and cultures influence inclusive practices. What is a culturally responsive teacher?	Teaching Standards for QTS (DfE,2012) focus on the importance of promoting inclusive practices in the classroom, especially TS1, TS2, TS4 and TS5 and Part 2 Adopting an approach to RE which recognises and values plurality and encourages contributions from all by creating safe classrooms and environments contributes to beginner teachers’ understanding of inclusive practices. A key aspect is that of helping all pupils to feel respected and included within a class. Teachers should be aware of the backgrounds of their pupils, including their interests beyond the classroom. Teaching about religions and worldviews encourages pupils to be interested in others and develop empathetic understanding by reflection on their own ideas and experiences and those of others. In Intercultural Education, Eleanor Nesbitt explores different approaches to Birthdays. Beginner teachers can use this as a stimulus to explore their own attitudes to celebrations, learn about and recognise both diversity and commonality among themselves and their pupils. Resource: DIP Developing Culturally Responsive Teachers explores the idea of developing beginner teachers as culturally responsive teachers who are alert to issues of inclusion in their classrooms and active in assisting pupils through promoting self-esteem and agency.	Reading: Pett, S. Cross curricular learning	What is cross-curricular learning? How can RE contribute to pupils' understanding about their place in the world?	Many primary schools use a topic approach to deliver some parts of the primary curriculum. RE can make a valuable contribution to pupils' cross-curricular understanding when it is included in such an approach, as long as the integrity of the RE learning is recognised and meaningful links are made. RE can be seen as part of humanities (Geography, History, RE and Citizenship) learning in foundation subjects by focusing on what it is to be human and how humans can relate to the world. Concepts such as identity and belonging cross across these subjects and RE could be represented by considering the role of religion and worldviews in individual and group identities. This website shows a project which promotes humanities learning in the primary curriculum. http://www.humanities2020.org.uk/ RE also has strong connections with the arts and literature through expressions of belief and understanding. Examples can be found in the listed chapters in Webster (2010) and Elton-Chalcraft(2015). Beginner teachers could be encouraged to see meaningful links through topics such as Pattern and Perfection and Who am I? Connections can also be made through the Spirited Arts project run annually by NATRE. Beginner teachers could be made aware of this site to engage with a range of pupils' work over years of submissions.	General texts on cross-curricular learning Barnes, J. 		https://www.natre.org.uk/about-natre/projects/spirited-arts/spirited-arts-2019/ Pedagogies discussed in IMPORTANT: Pedagogy and Practice all work well in cross-curricular learning. Schools often run cross-curricular projects on their local area and beginner teachers should be encouraged to research the development of religions and religious groups in their locality. This can be tied into learning about Visits and Visitors and learning outside the classroom.
RE and the Local Context	This element allows for ITT providers to explore issues within their local context e.g. a school or MAT curriculum, a particular pedagogical approach, schools with a religious character	We have not provided any resources in this section as it will depend on the ITT provider focus however, some general suggestions might be: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - The local agreed syllabus - A school's RE policy and curriculum - The MAT RE policy and curriculum - A particular resource that is used in local schools - A local resource centre e.g. inter-faith centre, museum, British Library 	Reading: Pett, S. (2015) Religious Education: the Teacher's Guide. Birmingham: REToday pp.13-16
ITT providers may wish to use the course or activities from An Introduction to Religion and Worldviews for Primary Practitioners course, available online at https://www.reonline.org.uk/professional-development/free-self-study-courses/ as a supplement to their teaching on Primary RE.
